

To Whom It May Concern:

I currently subscribe to a satellite radio service. Quite frankly, due to the variety of content, the clarity of transmission, and the ability for me to receive a constant signal wherever I travel, I find XM to be superior to both FM and AM.

I have recently learned of a push by NAB to limit some of the content available on my subscription service. To me, this appears to be another well-funded, but unfounded, attempt to stifle competition. Can you say, "Anti-trust"? I would like to go on record as noting that I support XM, I value their instant traffic and weather transmissions in the metropolitan area in which I live, and I am appalled to think that a legitimate business service (which is superior to that provided via FM or AM) is under attack. I pay for my subscription service, I believe that part of what I pay for includes weather and traffic updates in the area in which I commute and live, and I would like to add my name to the list of those that oppose any attempt by NAB or others to limit my right to listen to the variety of stations and services for which I subscribe.

Respectfully yours,
Dan Robinson
